

GeoAnecdotes: The OxonmoCumbrian Period

I was feeling that my memory was going. Some years of retirement had made my mind sluggish and far less retentive. One spring day, a year or so ago, I carefully vacuumed my brain, delving into little used corners, to recover memories of my working life as a geologist. I had thirty years experience, researching groundwater aspects of the underground disposal of radioactive wastes, for the oldest (arguably) Geological Survey in the world. Something should emerge from the brain. After ten days of hard thinking, I had a large pile of memory particles. These I sorted into four piles: amusing anecdotes, hydrogeological science, a vast accumulation of the boring and mundane and items of such interest that they couldn't possibly be divulged. This series of books presents some of the anecdotes. They are light on geology and science, dealing more with interactions among people and situations. They cover a period of significant change in both technology and working practices. This volume relates joining the Survey, at its Harwell office, and investigating the hydrogeology of the Sellafield nuclear reprocessing site. A holiday in the Soviet Union on the Trans-Siberian Railway, in the depths of winter, contrasts with the balmy climate of the Cumbrian coast. Investigations in Scotland prove that the UK can provide challenging work environments. If anything grabs your fancy a place, a piece of equipment or a technique use your internet browser to find out more. I was surprised at what's out there.
