Excerpt: ... had made no reply, but had ridden away, which might be 1886. regarded to some extent as an admission that he could hardly July 31 claim having fulfilled his part of the contract. The defendant Hildyard & had, it was true, bought a second-hand tent, but its being ill-used. Sken. second-hand--whilst it might imply a certain amount of wear, and a want of cleanness--would not justify the condition in which this tent was found to be. It was too late then for the defendants to discard the tent. They required one for immediate use. If they had not used it, it might be, that on suing the plaintiff for breach of contract, they would have proved a considerable amount of damage sustained through his failure to supply a proper tent, but they had adopted the more reasonable course of using the tent, although not bound to take it, and of offering the sum of £5 for its use, which seemed to be a very fair tender. This appeared to be a termination of the case in accordance with substantial justice, and one which this Court should enforce. The Magistrate's judgment would, therefore, be amended by changing it into a judgment for plaintiff for £5--the amount of tender--the costs in the Court below and in review to be borne by the respondent.
